

Dear Hiring Manager,

I am currently teaching full-time at an English hagwon in Icheon and am seeking a new position starting around September of this year. I have been working in Korea since June 2024, and by the time I leave my current academy, I will have accumulated over two years of experience in the English teaching field here in Korea and another year prior in my own country. During this time, I have taught students of all ages, from kindergarten (as young as four years old) to middle school. I also lead weekly conversation classes for adults, which has allowed me to develop a broad range of teaching skills. My classes primarily focus on reading, speaking, and writing, as well as phonics for younger pupils.

I hold an F-6 visa and am therefore not dependent on employer sponsorship, which is why I am sending out my application despite not coming from one of the countries mentioned (I am from Germany). I do understand the desire to hire a native speaker, but I am confident that I can deliver the very same qualities. I have taken my personal English studies very seriously ever since: I moved to England after graduating high school, I attended English classes in Cambridge and acquired my Cambridge English Certificate. I later graduated with a Bachelor's degree in English Literature, obtained a TESOL certificate, and have years of experience teaching the language myself.

In fact, I do believe that I have an advantage no native speaker has, as I myself have been an English student for many years and can therefore easily identify with my students and their possible struggles. I have had the exact problems they encounter every day in their classroom and can therefore rely on my own experience to help my students overcome these challenges. I spent years learning, memorizing, and understanding English grammar and syntax, in much more depth than a native speaker ever had to, as they acquired the language naturally in childhood, and can easily help my students overcome the same obstacles. I want my students to be successful in their own language learning journey. I have attached a video of a TESOL mock lesson for first-grade students to demonstrate my teaching style and spoken English.

Thank you very much in advance for reading this and considering me as a possible future teacher. I have thoroughly enjoyed my teaching experience in Korea so far and truly wish that I can continue to do so.

Sincerely,

Elisabeth Milde
